inactivity as many of its members aged out or moved on.

Deena Fidler, president of the TriCounty Cattle Women Association, which covers Jefferson, Crook, and Deschutes County, told The Nugget that livestock producers feel increasing pressure to address, in a united fashion, many of the resurgent issues that have long plagued producers in the western United States: water, wolves, and private property rights.

“The industry is under attack,” Fidler said. “It’s a fight for food, and the future, and we are focused on, among other things, educating the next generation.”

According to the Oregon Department of Agriculture, the State of Oregon is home to over 37,000 farms and ranches that combined to create nearly 700,000 jobs and generate nearly $30 billion in wages and $12 billion in annual taxes in its most recent survey. The United States Department of Agriculture consistently ranks Oregon in the top tiers of livestock production, a category that includes honey, sheep and lambs, eggs, dairy cattle, as well as commercial beef cattle.

Agricultural Associations have a long history in Oregon, even prior to 1860 when delegates from the Oregon Fruit Growers Association first met in Salem to establish the Oregon State Agricultural Society. The First Cattleman’s Association was formed in Baker County in 1913.

Modern livestock associations work to promote healthy, sustainable production and land stewardship practices, while defending the industry’s interest in raising food and other commodities. McMichael told The Nugget that one of the DCLA’s top priorities is to continue working to sustain local FFA and 4-H programs, and to educate and encourage young people to become involved in the rewards offered from a life in agriculture.

The Deschutes County Livestock Association is open to all livestock producers, not just cattlemen. Matt Foster, who raises hay in Tumalo and serves as DCLA Vice President, told The Nugget that many producers feel they are being pigeon-holed by underinformed, or misinformed concerns, but are energized by a strong sense of community among producers. Of particular concern to Foster and others are what they consider to be short-sighted and overburdensome regulations, and local land-use issues including wildlife overlays that “sound good in principle but raise serious questions about private property rights.”
